

HERE'S A WAR OF THEATRE STARS

It's All About the Electric Sign at Weber & Ziegfeld's Which Spells the Name of the Actress Anna Held.

MISS DRESSLER'S FRIENDS WANT IT TAKEN DOWN.

They Believe She Has Made the Real Hit, and that Her Name, if Any, Should Flare Out on Broadway.

Grim-visaged war has reared its horrid front at Weber & Ziegfeld's, and the right little, tight little playhouse is in the throes of internal dimension that bids fair to move at least one star in the theatrical firmament. It's all on account of the big electric sign on the front of the theatre that spells "Anna Held."

Miss Dressler's friends are strongly of the opinion that Miss Held has held forth long enough; in fact, they regard it as singularly appropriate that the Parisienne's name should be in the past tense of the verb "to hold," for they insist that if any one member of the company is holding the centre of the stage, as judges by popular approval, it is the dainty and petite Marie. Accordingly they desire it blazoned forth to all Broadway; at least, they say, if her name doesn't appear, they don't want any name to shine out.

When the present "all-star" stock company was planned it was agreed that no one was to be featured above another. The appearance of Miss Held's name on the sign soon dispelled any idea that this condition was to prevail, but the consequent weepings and wailings were subdued until after the opening. Then, after the utmost efforts of Miss Held's friends in the audience to exalt her to a position above her companions, when the Dressler simply stole the entire show, the mutterings of rebellion became distinctly audible. This was particularly true in the case of Miss Dressler, who demanded a recognition of the genuine success she had achieved. It is declared that she has presented an ultimatum to the powers that be, which says, in effect, either the name comes down or out she goes—and there she stands, waiting for the answer. She would be if she were to carry her threat into execution.

War correspondents are on the spot, and the rumble of battle may be expected from the vicinity of Broadway and Twenty-ninth street. "Joe" Weber's position is unenviable, for, whatever his inclination may be, he has as his partner the husband of the "star."

SISTER NOT DEAD, BUT OUT SHOPPING

Heartless Joker Sends Woman Note Telling Her of Relative's Death—She Sends Flowers and Orders Mourning Garb.

Mrs. Pauline Middlebroth, of No. 229 Jackson street, Hoboken, after elaborate preparations for the funeral of her sister, Mrs. Katrina Smollinger, of No. 78 Myrtle avenue, Jersey City, has now scores of reasons for not attending that funeral, the first of which is that the sister is not dead. The axles clothes and the flowers and the tears all went for naught, and now the Hoboken sister is looking for the practical Jersey City joker who was the cause of all the expense.

When a tear-stained note signed by Otto Smollinger reached his aunt in Hoboken, telling her of the death of her sister, she nearly fainted from the shock. After her grief had somewhat settled she set about making preparations for the funeral. The flowers were ordered and a dressmaker hurriedly obtained and black goods bought. The costume was ready for the funeral on time.

Mrs. Middlebroth then went to Hoboken. At the home of her sister she found everything as it should not be—Mrs. Smollinger out shopping and the flowers in a big vase on the parlor table.

She would like to meet the joker who signed Otto's name to the mourning letter.

HUNTS WOMAN TO GIVE A FORTUNE

If Spokane Miner Can Find "Mrs. Austin," Thought to Be in New York, He Will Hand Her $275,000.

C. H. Lithgon, a Spokane (Wash.) millionaire, is on his way to New York to search for a Mrs. Austin, to whom he wishes to hand $275,000 as her share in a mining deal involving valuable mining property near Butte, Mont. Many years ago Mrs. Austin was given an interest in some mining property near Butte, which at the time was practically worthless. So little importance was attached to the gift then that not even the trouble was taken to make a record of the woman's full name and address.

Later a big strike was made in the mine, and the property became so valuable that a syndicate offered a large sum for it. The deal could have been made without the co-operation of Mrs. Austin, but Lithgon, who is also interested in the mine, wanted her to have her full share.

Several weeks ago he began a search for the woman, which took him to several cities in the upper part of this State. Finally a trace led him to Syracuse. He could not find Mrs. Austin, but was informed that she had moved to New York City about eight years ago. He will now try to locate her here. If he cannot find her by the first of next month he will give up the search, and Mrs. Austin will be left out in the cold.
